The concept. A support level is a price area where buyers have previously stepped in and stopped a decline; a resistance level is an area where sellers have previously capped a rally. Traders read them off past highs, lows and closes. They are not guarantees: the more often a level has held, and the more value traded around it, the more attention it draws, and a close beyond it is usually treated as more meaningful than a brief intraday spike. When a level breaks, it often changes role: broken support can become resistance, and broken resistance can become support.

PSEi levels (DQR)	Value
Support: Oct 26 close and low	5,641.18 (the low of the three-day slide)
Oct 28 intraday low / close	5,634.65 (6.53 below that support) / 5,653.55 (12.37 above it)
Resistance: Oct 26 high	5,709.08; Oct 28 open 5,709.88, high 5,711.88 (2.80 above)
Resistance: Oct 22 low / close	5,743.29 / 5,779.73; Oct 27 closed at 5,761.19
Carried 52-week low	5,584.35 (not in the DQR; verify)
Desk X post zones (single-source)	Support 5,600–5,650; resistance 5,900–6,000; neutral-to-bearish bias

Why it matters today. On Oct 27 the PSEi closed at 5,761.19, above 5,709.08 and 5,743.29, so those levels were expected to act as support. On Oct 28 the index opened at 5,709.88, rose no more than 2.80 points above 5,709.08 and then sold off, so the level did not hold. The slide stopped just short of the 5,641.18 support: the intraday low of 5,634.65 dipped 6.53 points below it, but the close of 5,653.55 finished above it, and the desk's 5,600–5,650 zone sits just below. Value also fell from ₱9.52B to ₱7.89B, so the bounce attempt had less activity behind it.
How to use it. (1) Mark levels from actual highs, lows and closes in the DQR, not round guesses. (2) Weigh closes more than intraday spikes. (3) Expect broken levels to flip roles. (4) Check the value traded: a break on heavy value is more credible than one on thin value. (5) Treat levels as zones and probabilities, not predictions. Takeaway: a support or resistance level is a map of where buyers and sellers acted before, and today's close just above 5,641.18 keeps that line in focus.
